The Centre for Law and Public Affairs

(CeLAPA) sprang from the need to understand the law in the context of more comprehensive inquiries into political legitimacy, the origins and content of human rights, the site and scope of justice, the conditions for legal and moral responsibility and the concept of a good life in a diverse world. The research community of CeLAPA engages critically with the state-centered conceptions of democracy, rights and the rule of law by integrating them into wider debates on the conditions of living together in a pluralistic world, under fair terms of co-operation. In their research methodology the researchers of CeLAPA adopt a problem-oriented and interdisciplinary approach to legal questions, which synthesizes the legal doctrine with constitutional theory, political science, political economy, political philosophy the philosophy of action and moral philosophy. The multidisciplinary scope and international sensitivity of CeLAPA is conducive to publications and other research outcomes that integrate domestic with international legal scholarship, mostly appearing in international peer reviewed publications.

Interrogating the gender binary: Foundational difference or hegemonic matrix?

THE DISTINCTION between women and men, or femininity and masculinity, has long been considered as foundational to human societies and the organization of their institutions. In the last decades, the massive literature on gender has challenged many pillars of this discursive construction, as indeed a construction that feeds off deep-rooted but prejudiced understandings of human nature and human sociality. Gender has been disassembled and reassembled, variously considered as social practice, performance, ideology. Yet, the binary distinction femininity/masculinity continues to be regarded as a characterizing trait of Western societies (even in those sexual equality agendas that, whether inadvertently or not, reinstate a lexicon of difference). Whether it is a reification that is insensitive to historicization or a genuinely natural trait of the human, gender is one of the pivots of social organization. As a consequence, the hierarchies, power differentials and sexist biases overtly and covertly attached to it continue to permeate the social world and to affect social actors' principle of vision and division.

This international workshop intends to tackle the tricky questions of whether dismantling the binary is desirable, possible or beneficial, and, more fundamentally, whether institutions could or should contribute to this undertaking. In doing so, the workshop will analyze the relationship between politico-judicial institutions (their language, products and organizational patterns) and the functioning of gender as a conceptual and pragmatic device at both a social and an institutional level.
